surly. Take your places for the buyers gather now."

Abu and Zarka exchanged glances. They had learned rightly that Prince Nur al-Din, sending All Shar to the slave galleys to be soid into slavery, had indeed ordered that he be turned over to the highest bidder. They were prepared to buy, for they had gold in plenty furnished them by Sharazad.

The auctioneer, a veteran greybeard, struck a gong and mounted upon his seat before the auction block "The sale is open," he declared solemnly. "Bring forth your wares."

He turned and clapped his hands. One of Nur al-Din's men led All Shar, in chains, from one of the slave dhows. The giant wrestier seemed very deplected. Two days of captivity had

"He'll make a gentle slave," aneered a buyer. "A worthless dog."
"I'll buy no such wild baboon," murmured another. The word went from mouth to mouth; no one would bdy such a wild beast who kicked men in the stomach. And so All Shar almost went for naught.
"I'll offer fifty dinar," cried Zarka, when the auctioneer asked for bids. "He's wild, but I cae tame him."
"Thou art mad," declared a buyer. The auctioneer jeered at Zarka, "Why, he would fetch more for dog meat," he said, sarcastically.

(Thou are come and merits dead of pricked a needle into All Shar's arm.

"You see"—the Chinawoman added. All Shar is tout a cry of pain; he leaped into the air, recised for a moment, and then fell unconscious upon the ground. The four Chinese men stepped forward, picked up the unconscious form of All Shar and thou by thy looks art a buyer of women."

Zarka advanced to the slave keeper: "I come to buy also, son of impudence," she said, sharply. The slave keeper laughed.

"Thou a buyer, and of men?" he roared. "What art thou in search of? If thou wouldst buy a husband, thou must have gold indeed."

"Cease thy chattering," snapped old Zarka. "I come to buy a man of strongth, a man who can do a mule's work in the field, and I have heard that ye sell such an one to-day."

In chains, from one of the slave dhows. The giant wrestler seemed very dejected. Two days of captivity had wounded his soul; his from chains had worn his flesh.

All's keeper returned and took hold of the chain. "Come, thou father of a babdon," he said. "Thou must be soid."

All groaned as the man led him again into the slave market. "Babdon to me?" he reared and kicked the keeper in the stomach. The man feil to the ground and the crowd foared with delight. All Shar shook his chains and let forth his cry of defiance, but a dozen keepers rushed to hold him, and he was led to the auction-block.

"He'll make a gentle slave," aneered a buyer. "A worthless dog."

"Why, he would fetch more for dog meat," he said, sarcastically.

"Dog meat? Thou dog"—reared All, and made a lunge toward the suctioneer. But strong mands restrained him. Zarka struck him sharply with the rod. "Slience, thou beast," she commanded, and All Shar howied for mercy, whereat the crowd laughed, to see him no cowardly, cringing before an old woman.

"Fifty dinar bid," repeated the auctioneer "Going"—A voice cried out from the balcony:
"A voice cried out from the balcony: "Now you have proof, me Wei San thrown into the slave mart before the block.

"Ah, that's better," said the auctioneer. "Another bid"—In and read its mark. "Five hundred," he said, in excitement.

Abu whispered to Zarka: "Throw down another bag of gold. "Two hundred was a sudden knock op the door below. A voice cried out Two hundred and the name better out another bag of gold. "Two hundred and the name and here of the message tori up by Nur al-Din, neatly pasted together. Sharazad read, "Kill my sister's son, and thou has a thousand dinars won. I shall pay in full. Nur al-Din."

"Yea—proof indeed," cried Sharazad, in a tremendous outburst of emotion. "And I have the dagger. I have sworn the murderer shall die by that self-same steel. Now Nur al-Din, thou shalt pay in full."

Before Sharazad could leave the house on her mission there was a sudden knock op the door below. A voice cried out: "Open, in the name voice cried out: "Open, in the name of the Sultan." -There came the noise of a door being forced, a crashing of wood-work, and the tramp of armed men. allway outside could be seen a dozen soldiers of the Sultan's guard; the Sultan bimself with drawn scimitar forced his way through them and in-
